

Media alert: Safe reporting on the ABS Causes of Death Data 2021

18 October 2022 | Please cascade to all media staff

The Australian Bureau of Statistics (ABS) will tomorrow release its 2021 Causes of Death data. This data set will include annual national suicide information.

Media and communications professionals reporting on the data and findings included in this report are encouraged to be thoughtful, responsible and accurate to reduce the risk of harm or stigma for those in the community with lived experience of mental ill-health and suicide.

Everymind will be hosting a joint online briefing session with the ABS for media and those working in the mental health and suicide prevention sector on the statistics specifically relating to suicide deaths.

Register and read more about this briefing here.

Recommendations for reporting about suicide data:

- Consider the context

It is important to note that there are a number of considerations when it comes to using and referencing statistics around mental ill-health and related issues. Avoid speculation and take care to frame statistics, trends and other study findings in their appropriate context. Mindframe has helpful advice on how to communicate about these kind of data and statistics.

- Seek expert commentary

The Mindframe Expert Directory connects media professionals with experienced individuals who can provide commentary relating to mental health and wellbeing to support safe, responsible, contextualised and accurate reporting and communication.

- Consult Mindframe guidelines

Mindframe has a series of guidelines and resources freely available for use by media including specific advice relating to the safe, sensitive and accurate reporting on suicide and other issues.

- Use safe, sensitive, and non-stigmatising language

Inaccurate language can have a serious and negative impact on public understanding and perceptions about suicide, may adversely impact those with lived experience, and discourage help-seeking behaviours. Read more about safe and non-stigmatising language here.

- Always include help-seeking information when communicating about mental ill-health and suicide

The inclusion of help-seeking information encourages individuals to seek help and support when it's needed. When discussing mental ill-health and suicide, it is important to include links or contact details for population groups that may be prominently featured in articles or coverage e.g., youth-based services that operate 24/7. Mindframe guidelines recommend including at least two services.
